About this report

This report gives you feedback on the Verbal Analysis Test you completed on 30 September 2026. It is written for you, and it is yours to keep. The organisation that invited you to take the test will let you know about the next steps in your application separately.

What the test measured

Three things that come up wherever written arguments have to be read, weighed and answered:

- Interpreting texts and documents – for example, deciding whether a statement is supported by a passage, contradicted by it, or not settled by it.
- Evaluating the logic of an argument – for example, seeing whether a conclusion really follows from what the passage established.
- Communicating and negotiating from the evidence – putting a case clearly and answering the other side's on what the text actually supports.

No specialist knowledge was needed. Everything you needed was in the passage on the screen.

Your result

Compared with other people who have taken this test, your overall result was Average.

You did about as well as most people who take this test. You handled the passages well; the marks most people lose are on the small things – an assumption the passage never made, a qualifier read past, a conclusion that sounded right but did not follow – and the following page is aimed at exactly those.

Areas to develop

Whatever your result, all three of the things the test measured improve quickly with regular practice on ordinary, everyday material – you don't need specialist resources to work on them.

Interpreting texts and documents. Keep a clear line between what a passage says and what you would assume; if it does not settle a point, the honest answer is that it does not. Try this: take any opinion piece and write three statements about it – one it supports, one it contradicts, one it does not cover. The third is the one to practise.

Evaluating the logic of an argument. Ask what the passage would need to have established for the conclusion to follow, then check whether it did. Try this: pick an argument you agree with and find its weakest step; then do the same for one you do not.

Communicating and negotiating from the evidence. A case is only as strong as its weakest supported step, and the other side will find it; find it first. Try this: before your next disagreement at work, write the other side's best point in one sentence and answer that, rather than their weakest.

These three habits – keep to what the text says, test whether the conclusion follows, and answer the other side's best point – are what sound judgement of written argument is built on. They are learned by doing, and they transfer to any role that calls on them. We hope this feedback is useful, and we wish you well with your application.
